Michael Leonidas Dertouzos, TIBCO Professor of Computer Science and Electrical Engineering and for the past 27 years Director of MIT's Laboratory for Computer Science, died on August 27, 2001 at the age of 64.

“I ... recommend that organizations form a small team of young-at-mind people who are Web savvy and have an intimate knowledge of the organization’s inner workings.

While committees can be deadly, killing a potential project even before it starts, this approach has worked wherever I have applied it, because the participants were chosen not as “representatives” of this or that department, but as passionate go-getters chomping at the bit to make a difference.

[emphasis added]

Continuing the Revolution

People go through three stages in examining the impact of future technology:

- awe and wonderment
- a sense of dread
- realize the promise, manage the peril

Ray Kurzweil
The Age of Spiritual Machines

Looking Ahead

“The criticality of information exploitation ... means that intellectual assets, collaboration and knowledge management are moving to the forefront of investment in 2002.”
